Lets say I have a timer checking every second if the user is trying to quit the program, and if the user tries to quit the program, it prevents them from doing so and the program quits. Now the problem is that I am using a Raspberry Pi which is rubbish at multi-tasking and the timer doesn't quite seem to work properly (It sometimes delays for seconds before continuing). So my question is, is there a way to stop certain parts of the code from running when a certain event happens? In terms of practicality, I just want it to prevent the program from shutting down unless the user has typed a quit message into the program. A: Uncommenting an entire block of code is a bad idea. Use a loop to check the condition and end the loop if the condition is met. Let the user exit by typing quit - then quit the loop and exit. In your code you are always exiting the loop, which is causing the program to quit immediately. Q: How can I change the number of threads used by MySQL? I'm using MySQL with InnoDB and trying to see if any memory optimizations can be made. I notice that the thread I run my load tests on has only one thread. I was hoping to see (for example) 2 threads on this box. I would like to do this manually for a while without loading my server, but I'm having trouble figuring out how to do this. Here is my configuration for the innodb_thread_concurrency: $ echo | cat /etc/my.cnf | grep innodb_thread_concurrency innodb_thread_concurrency = 8 What is the most simple and reliable way to raise the thread count on a production box? A: This is the correct setting for my.cnf (apart from the # surrounding the directive) ## The number of concurrent client connections # allowed per innodb server for a given session. # See
