In a double-blind, placebo-controlled, parallel design, 28 days, multicenter trial in 84 adults with seasonal allergic rhinitis, ranitidine was evaluated for efficacy and safety for a total of 8 weeks. All patients were given a nasal decongestant, ipratropium, four times daily. Paired analyses revealed that in the first 6 weeks ranitidine significantly ( $p$  less than 0.05) reduced the mean symptom scores, the mean nasal serum IgE, and total serum IgE (measured at base line, at the end of treatment, and after a 4-week wash-out period). However, there were no significant differences in symptom scores or serum IgE in the second 6 weeks. The percentage of patients improving 50% or more in each of the symptoms evaluated in the first 6 weeks was significantly ( $p$  less than 0.05) greater in the ranitidine group than in the placebo group. In a subgroup of 24 patients with moderate to severe disease, only those patients receiving ranitidine maintained the benefits seen in the first 6 weeks. In a combined analysis of all 84 patients, patients receiving ranitidine continued to have a significantly ( $p$  less than 0.05) greater percentage of symptom improvement than those receiving placebo. There were no significant differences between the two treatment groups regarding adverse events. Binding of a c-fos fusion protein to the Escherichia coli promoter of phage lambda. A protein coded by the  $\sigma_{12}$  gene of the broad-host-range bacteriophage lambda undergoes a cotranslational processing that leads to the formation of a fusion protein with an apparent molecular weight of 42,000. We report here the binding of a c-fos-lambda fusion protein to the Escherichia coli cI and cI857 promoters. If the c-fos mRNA is translated on the same ribosome as the lambda mRNA, the fusion protein binds specifically to the E. coli cI857 promoter, preferentially to the promoter in the P-state. In contrast, when the c-fos protein is translated on
