In humans, the motor cortex is often stimulated using transcranial magnetic stimulation (TMS) to evaluate the threshold for activation of motor units and the cortical area responsible for the generation of a motor action. It is generally thought that in the motor cortex there is a relationship between the size of the motor threshold and the motor capacity of a person. However, relatively large thresholds are not necessarily related to poor motor capacity and vice versa. Therefore, a more detailed investigation of the relationship between the size of the motor threshold and motor capacity is required. In order to undertake such an investigation, the ability to generate, online, graded movements at different intensities is a prerequisite. The aim of the present paper is to describe an easy and reliable method for moving-jaw and tongue movements in human subjects. A modified TMS motor threshold-vastus medialis (VT) assessment protocol was developed to evaluate motor capacity. The TMS VT assessment protocol was then used to investigate the relationship between the motor threshold (in the face of a continuous motor task) and motor capacity, using different graded movement tasks and selfpaced movements. The results suggest that movement-specific cortical excitability changes of the motor cortex reflect the ability to generate nonvolitional movements online. By changing the degree of interference induced by the movement, it was found that the participants were able to produce the movements online, even when the movements were relatively slow (5-7 degrees). Furthermore, the participant was able to produce the movements online regardless of the degree of neurophysiological interference. These findings provide a basis for future studies on the relationship between TMS motor threshold and motor capacity. Chaotic landscape in a simple model of DNA denaturation. We study a simple model of DNA denaturation: a flexible lattice polymer with nearest-neighbor interactions. Allowing for the population of the configurations with different numbers of denaturated fragments, the equilibrium properties of the polymer are studied using Monte Carlo simulations. We investigate the "reaction-limited" regime

The torch Two torches are required for the operation of an LCMAW system; a plasma cutting torch for cutting, and a metal inert gas (MIG) welding torch for welding. An additional gas source is also required. Because the LCMAW process operates at very high temperatures (up to $2000^{\circ} \mathrm{C}$ ) the delivery of shielding gas becomes very critical. Therefore, MIG welding atmospheres are more appropriate for LCMAW than plasma cutting atmospheres. The product of the LCMAW process is a relatively thick weld bead (generally up to 70 mm , or 2.75 inches), normally located at the lower (cutting) side of the cut, with the 3da54e8ca3
