Smith in free ePub.1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to methods and means for cleaning oil and water from a gun barrel. More particularly, the invention relates to a method of cleaning a gun barrel which uses a liquid cleaning medium to clean the metal of the gun barrel and a method of charging the cleaning medium into the barrel prior to shooting. The invention also relates to a means for cleaning a gun barrel which includes a cartridge for filling the barrel with the cleaning medium and means for electrically charging the cartridge. 2. Discussion of the Related Art The increased use of guns for sport shooting, hunting and various other purposes has created a need for gun barrels to be cleaned both for aesthetic reasons and to prevent errant bullets and shell casings from damaging various nearby structures, e.g., automobiles, fences, etc. Unfortunately, the application of shot and powder residue and the development of corrosion prevent the barrel from being cleaned immediately after shooting and precludes the utilization of the barrel for future shots. Various systems have been devised for cleaning gun barrels such as those shown in U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,632,573, 5,067,306, 5,370,092, 5,649,394, 5,738,156 and 5,819,396. Each of these systems, however, is based on the same concepts: a gun barrel is placed into a chamber which is then completely filled with a cleaning medium. After several hours, the cleaning medium is then drained from the chamber so that the barrel may be fired again. The problem with this concept is that, among other things, the temperature of the cleaning medium is only moderately elevated, often below room temperature. This causes the gun barrel to have a tendency to freeze at the seat of the barrel. Also, the gun barrels are generally filled with cleaning medium for many hours and there is a lengthy time required for the gun barrel to thaw sufficiently for the weapon to be fired. This increases the amount of time the firearm is disabled. Further, it is a rather complex task to
