Biometric is a new authentication technology which comes with a lot of features and advantages. In the world of cyber security, biometric authentication is the ideal technology for authentication, proof of identity, and verification and can be used for almost any application. One of the most popular biometric features is fingerprint recognition, and scanners and fingerprint readers are available in many laptops, laptops, mobile devices, PDAs, PCs, etc. Whether you are using a fingerprint scanner for business purposes, your home PC, your laptop, your mobile phone, etc., biometric is a very effective way of authenticating and securing your data from unwanted intruders. While we use our fingers to write this guide, there are a number of other biometric features that can be used instead of our fingers. Biometric Features

Fingerprint Recognition

Fingerprints are the most popular biometric feature and are also the most common authentication mechanism used today. Based on the print pattern unique to each individual, fingerprints are used for identification. Fingerprints are composed of minutest points and lines which are called ridges and valleys. These minutest features are not visible to the naked eye, but can be seen using a high powered microscope, camera, or scanner. Fingerprints have tremendous security, as they are among the most difficult to imitate. One cannot merely take a fingerprint of the owner, but has to have the original print to duplicate the same. Biometric Scanners Biometric scanners work on the same principle as a fingerprint reader, but the scanner uses various light sources instead of fingerprints. The scanner uses light beams to capture the pattern of the minutest ridge and valleys on your fingertip, just like a fingerprint scanner uses a laser beam for the same purpose. A biometric scanner is also available in more than one form, such as the NetraSight Biometric Fingertip Reader, which also identifies users based on iris scans. Pros: Rapid and easy to use No chances of duplication Relatively good accuracy, though variable depending on the model Cons: Not accurate for identifying “fakes” or forgeries Not very useful for those who have an extremely dry or oily finger Finger swab This may seem like an antiquated method of biometric authentication, but the fingerprint swab can be a very effective tool for identification.
