This work focuses on the application of piezoelectric thawing and freezing in a nanosecond pulsed electric field (nsPEF) for the killing of live viruses such as the baculovirus (a very dangerous insect virus). Three sources of nsPEF pulses, i.e., a capacitor-based nsPEF generator, a high voltage (HV) pulse generator, and an electric discharge ion source, were used to generate nsPEFs at different field strength (7-12 kV/cm) and the time-averaged electric field (E(avg)). For comparison, the nsPEFs generated using an HV pulse generator at 17.5 kV/cm were also used. The electric field strength, the nsPEF dose, the number of pulses, the pulse width, and the time were varied to optimize the virus killing efficiency. This study showed that higher field strength, longer pulse duration, and more pulses were all correlated with higher virus kill efficiency. For the viruses tested, the nsPEF pulses from the HV pulse generator at 17.5 kV/cm showed higher killing efficiency compared with those generated using the capacitor-based nsPEF generator and the ion source, while the HV pulses showed less influence on the viruses than the capacitive pulses. The application of the nsPEF pulses on Bacillus thuringiensis (Berliner strain) has been demonstrated to be efficient. This work provided a proof of concept that piezoelectric thawing and freezing in a nsPEF can be used to control the live viruses. This study suggests that the nsPEF pulse can be used as an efficient technology to control these viruses.
