A novel cell surface differentiation stage-specific disulfide-linked dimeric and trimeric isoenzyme marker system that identifies myeloid, early granulocyte and erythroid progenitor cell populations has been developed. The disulfide-bonded markers were characterized by sugar and lectin-affinity chromatography and by their molecular heterogeneity in tryptic peptides separated by polyacrylamide gel electrophoresis. Myeloid disulfide-linked dimers (m-type) and trimers (c-type) were found in malignant myeloid cells at a relatively high frequency. The myeloid markers were also detected in the myeloid and erythroid progenitor cell populations in normal bone

In 1990, an estimated 1.4 million Americans had already been infected with HIV. As of December 31, 1996, an estimated 1.3 million people in the United States had been infected, but while incidence of HIV infection is increasing, the growth rate has slowed. In 1985, the US Public Health Service (PHS) recommended that persons at increased risk for HIV infection should be tested for HIV antibodies. Since the virus could only be transmitted during the time of transmission (by sexual intercourse, contaminated needles and syringes, and blood transfusions), diagnosis of HIV antibodies facilitated identification of subjects who should receive counseling and recommendation for antiviral therapy. In 1987, this counseling and antiviral therapy was recommended only for those infected with HIV-1 or a closely related virus, for its high transmissibility and rapidity of transmission, i.e. a "second window period" within which HIV antibodies could be detected. The introduction of highly active antiretroviral therapies (HAART) in 1995 and 1996 has contributed to extending the second window period, and individuals infected with HIV have the opportunity to develop antibodies to the virus for years following seroconversion. As a result, millions of HIV-infected individuals are now being diagnosed (where previously only a small fraction of the HIV-infected population was diagnosed). Theoretically, therefore, diagnosis of HIV infection has become much more difficult. In the past, diagnosis of HIV infection was based on the presence of antibodies to HIV.
