Rangka Atap Baja RinganCyclopentenone prostaglandins: an endogenous ligand for the nociceptive TRPA1 receptor. While endocannabinoids and prostanoids have recently been shown to have anti-nociceptive properties via selective cannabinoid and prostaglandin receptors, respectively, evidence is now emerging for the existence of a prostanoid receptor which is linked to the nociceptive TRPA1 (transient receptor potential ankyrin 1) receptor. Unsaturated cyclopentenone prostaglandins represent a new class of endogenous ligands for TRPA1 which is activated by a range of electrophiles. This has led to the classification of prostaglandins into TRPA1 agonists and antagonists according to their effect on capsaicin-evoked responses of sensory nerve terminals. Cyclopentenone prostaglandins are contained within endocannabinoids and are released from sensory nerve endings during inflammation and injury. Further investigations of the mechanism of action of TRPA1 agonists indicate that these endogenous ligands induce nociception by a mechanism which involves the opening of TRPA1 ion channels and the production of calcium influx. The role of the TRPA1 receptor in mediating cyclopentenone prostaglandin-induced nociception has been further confirmed by the demonstration that TRPA1 antagonists can protect against the pain associated with the infiltration of citronellal into skin. In addition to its nociceptive effects, cyclopentenone prostaglandins are lipid soluble and exhibit anti-
