A variety of different situations arise in succession, but are not limited by previously-decided route. Towards the very end of the story, there is an enormous battle which no one can predict, requiring ingenuity and skill.

Truly memorable story where the tension and suspense build steadily. The writing is excellent and the characters are fun to interact with.

A difficulty rating system that keeps the difficulty from becoming too high, making it easy for beginners to enjoy.

A huge variety of maps that you can leave out or explore freely.

A "Trophy System" that allows players who attack monsters that drop powerful loot to earn "Elden Lord" titles. As the titles increase, your skills will go up as well.

An option to change your equipment to a different type as your level goes up.

Full feature list:

Default equipment option: Equip "Valhalla" and armors which gain you 1CP for every point in the Attribute score that you exceed. * Building a powerful ranch house is a good idea, as not only will you gain CP from storing your cheese, you will get bonus CP from making cheese, thereby increasing your overall CP/milk and cheese milk gain. * Training the right skills (and having the right attribute score) is key. Make sure to not overextend and try not to train too many useless skills that just barely lift your stats. * Make a bunch of cheese milk. Buy milk to brew high CP cheese for maximum CP/milk and/or cheese milk.

I have a version 8 database that's nearing its end of life. I have a project that's consuming a lot of space on the table 'Records', and that looks like it's going to continue for a while. Is it safe to delete any records from the 'Records' table in my database or will that cause anything to go wrong? A: Removing records from the 'Records' table or indeed any table is a dangerous thing to do. Your plan will always be to attempt to remove the offending record, then insert a new one, which will then cause any event handlers to be run. Events will fire when you remove records because they trigger the 'COMMIT' statement. Your 'Records' table is not a transactional table and your event handlers probably aren't either. I think you have a couple of options. Remove the offending record and attempt to re-insert it. This will trigger the event handlers. Schedule an audit job and remove the offending records from the 'Records' table. Use the '_BLOBs' table to store your data because it's transactional and won't cause the events to fire. What you need to be aware of is that if you remove rows from a table that are referenced from other tables, then that table will need to be truncated, which may have consequences if you have triggers, stored procedures or other logic that relies on referential integrity. If you are using a lot of space in the 'Records' table and you need to keep it, you could try adding a query hint to force space to be reused, and disable triggers. This will
