(Source: peculiar behaviour of logistic regression has been an important issue in statistics since its inception. This problem has been extensively studied, but mainly for the fixed effects logistic model, where various results are known. In this article we study its behaviour in the general context of polynomial time-varying effects. The simulation study in this article reveals that for general polynomial time-varying effects, the type I error control may be seriously compromised, and this happens in the worst cases for the univariate setting. The study is motivated by an observational study concerning depression, where the strength of the time-varying effect is highest at around week 4 of the study. Interestingly, when time-varying effects are non-linear, the control of the type I error is less severely compromised. We also studied the distribution of the tests statistics based on a real data example, where the linear time-varying effects are time and career spent in the military. By means of simulations, we illustrated the effect of the type I error control by providing plots with the rejection and type II error rates. We also showed that the empirical coverages of the tests statistics based on the two time-varying models are very similar for the linear model. no-repeat 16px 0; padding: 5px 0 0 15px; } #wpadminbar.menupop.selected a, #wpadminbar.menupop.selected span { background: none; } } } } .wp-menu-image { position: absolute; top: 0; right: 0; bottom: 0; left: 0; bff6bb2d33

I have a module with missing artifacts. I can still build the module, but Intellij's Change Log page is not showing them. Why is that? A: From the point of view of the IDEA project, these missing artifacts simply don't exist, I think. IDEA won't show you these missing artifacts in the Change Log. When you add a new Maven artifact, you need to select "Add artifacts" from the navigation pop-up menu. In the dialog that will appear, you need to make sure you select the correct project as the target project and the correct module as the module for which to generate the artifacts. So, if you, for example, want to import a particular Maven artifact and generate it for a given module, you need to check the "Only for module" checkbox on the "Artifact publishing" tab. This dialog is where you need to select the correct module and project, if necessary. And here is the final dialog where you select the artifact and save it. Note that in this particular case, there are two missing artifacts (because I don't actually need to import one of them), so the "Add artifacts" option is grayed out. A: The problem is fixed now.
