Done! call for military restraint in Iraq (ABC News) An Iraqi woman tries to shield a child from the deadly violence as she takes refuge at a refugee camp for Muslim displaced families in Irbil, Iraq, Monday, Feb. 3, 2007. According to the U.N. refugee agency, al-Zahra Camp in Irbil is housing 22,550 people, mainly from neighboring countries such as Turkey and Iran. (AP Photo/Hadi Mizban) In their post, the group said, "We want the Iraqi government to respect Iraq's people, to respect the international laws of war, to respect peace and truce and to respect the U.N. mission. The U.S. government should stop supporting terrorist in Iraq." The United States military launched an offensive in Iraq on Wednesday, March 20, 2003, as part of a broad campaign that had been in the works since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The initial objectives were to overthrow Saddam Hussein and to liberate the Iraqi people. After removing the dictator, the purpose of the U.S. invasion was to establish a new government. The initial occupation forces were made up of U.S. soldiers and Marines, but the mission quickly expanded as the United States relied on a coalition of armed and non-armed forces, including Iraqi troops. Coalition forces continue to provide training and provide limited combat support to the Iraqi Army, which is responsible for most of the fighting. On Thursday, March 21, the Defense Department released the so-called Urgent Operational Needs Statement, a policy that gives the Pentagon a legal basis to prosecute members of foreign forces who kill U.S. soldiers or other U.S. forces assigned to the Iraq War. If President Bush agrees with the policy statement, then troops could be prosecuted in Iraq for killing members of the Iraqi military or Iraqi citizens on behalf of the Iraqi government.
