EuroTruckSimulator2v131092InclALLDLCsSerialKeykeygen Serial KeyQ: I/O redirection to both /dev/null and /dev/null, possible? I'm writing a supercollider script in python to interact with a DAWX plugin. The script is writing to STDOUT (the same as the file output) in order to interact with the plugin. I need to redirect this output to both /dev/null and my own script's STDOUT. The flow of my own script's STDOUT is: - write a few lines of program output to stdout - redirect stdout to /dev/null - the program completes and exits, releasing the file descriptor - my script continues to read the output from /dev/null Is there a way to redirect stdout in this scenario? Edit: I'm not sure if this helps, but my script is reading from the plugin's stdout, not from mine. A: By default, FDs are inherited from parent processes. So to let them go to both file and the process that wrote them, you can call setsid (or similar, depending on whether the script is running as a different user): import subprocess subprocess.call(['setsid', '-n'] + ['python', '-c',...]) If the script is running as the same user as the parent process, just don't do setsid. Particulate pollution and the cardiovascular system. Pollution is a global health concern with population exposures that affect a large number of individuals. Many of these substances are represented as particles, and the respiratory and cardiovascular system are at the greatest risk of direct exposure and uptake of particulates. Over the last decade, air pollution has been a significant health concern in the United States. In addition, particulate pollution is increasing in many industrializing regions. Toxicological studies have demonstrated that particle air pollution induces significant oxidative stress, inflammation and cell apoptosis. Many of these effects occur in the cardiovascular system, leading to the development of a wide range of cardiopulmonary diseases and pathologies. An important source of particle pollution arises from the combustion of fossil fuels, contributing to both local and global pollution. For the purpose of this review, the particulate air pollution arising from regional air pollution sources
