The efficiency and generality of transfection using calcium phosphate as a vector for DNA delivery into cells was evaluated. Two different reporter gene constructs were used, the chloramphenicol acetyl transferase (CAT) and the beta-galactosidase (beta-gal) genes. The former is constitutively expressed, whereas the latter is only expressed in a regulated fashion. Both genes were cloned into a eukaryotic expression vector to ensure that the expression was under the control of a eukaryotic promoter and the same terminator sequence. Only transient expression of CAT was achieved in human cells, with a maximum efficiency of 40-50% of that found with the viral vector, such as adenovirus. In addition, although only transient expression was observed in cultured human cells, expression was stable when treated with mouse serum in vitro and highly transient in vivo.
