The Lisbon Treaty is considered to be the most important treaty for the development of the European Union. In this new perspective, health care in Portugal seems to be greatly affected, and this appears to be even more acute in the public sector. A retrospective analysis of article 3 of the Treaty on European Union and of its implementation will be done in order to assess the effect of the Lisbon Treaty on the Portuguese health care system. The analysis will focus on the evolution of the "National Health Care System" and its features. The study will also assess the effect of the modifications to the General Health Act found in article 3 of the Treaty on European Union and its implementation. The data available were extracted from the official documents published by the competent authorities and other national and international sources. Portugal entered as a full member of the European Union in 1986. The Lisbon Treaty establishes an agenda which is similar to that envisaged at the time of ratification. It essentially concerns the public domain and its characteristics as well as the role of the Union in this field. The General Health Act is being reformed with the aid of the provisions of article 3 of the Treaty on European Union. However, the specific health act itself, which was passed in 2003, is not affected by the Treaty. The provisions established in article 3 of the Treaty will affect the future agenda in the area of health care. This study indicates that it is difficult to gauge the specific effects of the new provisions of the Lisbon Treaty in the field of health care in Portugal. It is true that this Treaty has the capacity to increase the degree of implementation of European directives in health matters, and this can be the case of specific directives and guidelines, like for example the directive on the rights of patients, which was passed in 2004.

The lack of specific measures in the field of health care can probably be explained by the difficulties which are entailed by its specific character.HMG-CoA reductase inhibitors as antithrombotic agents.
