Can a freeze-and-thaw operation of a mobile phone/tablet/laptop works only once (on startup) or can it be repeated (or even more) and what if it? For instance, if the battery level of the device is low, will the battery die after a single freeze-and-thaw cycle or, the battery might be quite saved with some charge left? What if the battery is already charged, is there a danger that the battery won't be charged and this operation won't work? What if the phone/tablet/laptop is already suspended and the user wakes it up and then does the operation? A: Depends on the hardware. On mobile phone, the first time you power off, you lose all power and charging, because the device is not connected to charger and is powered off. Once you power it on, the phone will start charging. However, most of newer mobile devices already have a "LOW battery" mode, where the battery is fully charged, but the display turns off. From this state, you can either wake up your device, or turn it off, and it will charge itself from this state
