I would love to thank you if you can help!The state's top elections official on Thursday said the Department of State is looking at contingency plans for a recount of votes cast during the Nov. 8 election in Hamilton County. Ohio Secretary of State Jon Husted said the "simple fact" is that it only takes about an hour to recount the nearly 2 million votes cast in Hamilton County — more than a quarter of the total statewide. But if someone files a challenge or appeal, it could drag on for weeks or months, with lawyers filing briefs and judges considering their arguments. "It wouldn't change the outcome of the election, but it could potentially delay it," Husted said. "We will use every possible avenue to ensure that process is fair and impartial." Husted and Hamilton County Board of Elections officials could not recall a time when a recount was ordered before election day, but he said there have been recounts ordered since. "The election is over," he said. Should a recount be ordered, the margin of victories and defeats could be narrowed. An election night tally of the Hamilton County vote showed Republican Gov. John Kasich with almost 66,000 more votes than Democrat Ted Strickland, or a 2.3 percent win. A recount could, at best, narrow that to a 1.2 percent win for Strickland, according to The Enquirer's election forecast, released Wednesday. Husted said after the initial tally was released, Democrats filed unsuccessful challenges in numerous places to try to change the final totals. Former Ohio Democratic Party Chairman Chris Redfern, a Cincinnati lawyer who worked on those challenges, declined to comment. Redfern said in an interview last week that some of his clients were told they would need to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars to file a challenge, but Redfern said he has not been able to verify that. Republican Party of Ohio spokesman Jeff Brown said last week that he does not know of any challenges or appeals to the state Board of Elections from Strick

Twixtor to match video and audio.Q: How to translate "a smart yet not over-smart boy"? An example sentence would be "He is an honest but a smart boy". Is it correct to use "honest" and "smart" this way? A: I think you can see your phrase as falling under four grammatical categories: 1. A Smart Boy is an Honest Boy. 2. An Honest Boy is a Smart Boy. 3. An Honest Boy is either a Smart Boy or a Boy. 4. An Honest Boy is a "Smart Boy". In the first case you have an explicit description of both characteristics within the same adjective phrase (hence my "an"). The second case gives the first word of the phrase the adjective characteristic and applies the second word to the individual described. The third case seems to describe all honest boys. In the fourth case, the adjective phrase is used as a qualifier for honest. Using the third case, which is my preference: "He is an honest but a smart boy" The same idea expressed in the first and second cases. If the word are were omitted, in that case, you would be making an adjective of the noun boy. "An honest boy is a smart boy" "He is an honest boy and he is a smart boy" Also note that if the boy is already considered a smart boy, the phrase is not really adding any information.
