It's useful to create a simple image effect to showcase to clients and customers, or to simulate a glossy paper print to display on your Instagram feed, for example. You can simulate the print of a photo, as seen in this example. Or you can simulate the print of a photo with the photo's border color. Image Shine works on both Mac and Windows. Line array loudspeaker A line array loudspeaker is one of the types of loudspeakers, and is an array of loudspeakers that is at least several feet long. Line array loudspeakers have been used to create convincing acoustic "images" of full-length or lengthy recorded material. A line array is a long set of woofer drivers of different lengths that is aimed at a listener. The sound is passed through a diffraction grid, usually of triangular shape and made of plastic, to ensure that the dispersion pattern will have some "focus" towards the target, and will be smooth over its entire length. Sound comes from a power amplifier and is fed into the woofers. Each driver is driven to maximum displacement, and a woofer horn of appropriate size is used to direct the sound towards the listener. The woofers can be as close as a foot from the listener or as far away as 100 feet or more. Each driver can be mounted in such a way that the woofer cone can be adjusted with equal precision throughout the array, so that it will have perfect dispersion. The sound is sent through the diffraction grid, and a microphone can be used to measure how well the sound disperses, and also its quality. The positive-displacement woofers are similar to those used with bulletins and disc-type speakers. The negative-displacement woofers, however, are smaller in size than the positive-displacement drivers, as they are used for large-displacement speakers. The negative-displacement drivers can be as small as 6" but they are generally preferred for their higher efficiency. Line array speakers are sometimes confused with convex line arrays, and with diffraction grids and acoustic horns. A radioisotope scan in the diagnosis of renal cell carcinoma. The authors compared the accuracy of 99mTc-DMSA and 131I-OIH renal scans in detecting renal cell carcinoma in a retrospective analysis of more than 100 patients. The results showed that DMSA had better sensitivity than OIH scan in detecting renal cell carcinoma; that a tumor higher than 15 mm in diameter tended to be underestimated by DMSA scan; and that the value of DMSA scan in detecting early renal cell carcinoma was limited, especially in patients with moderate or severe hydronephrosis. DMSA scan has a limited role in the diagnosis of renal cell carcinoma in the presence of moderate hydronephrosis.
