John T. Ludlow John Talbot Ludlow (February 19, 1844 in Brooklyn, New York – July 16, 1920 in Brooklyn, New York) was an American architect. Biography John Talbot Ludlow was the son of William S. Ludlow (1803-1874) and his wife, Sarah "Sadie" (Talbot) Ludlow (1812-1864). A cadet of St. Paul's School in New Hampshire, he graduated in 1868 and then went to Cornell, where he studied architecture and civil engineering. Upon graduation, he was appointed principal of the newly established Cornell Agricultural School (now Cornell University). In 1874, he was hired to replace Henry Appleton in the architectural office of John Calvin

Stevens in Boston. In Boston, Ludlow also befriended noted author Henry James, and modeled the architectural design of the farmhouse and surrounding properties in Washington Square that James lived in from 1886 to 1890. During this period, James helped Ludlow meet his longtime mentor and friend, the critic William Dean Howells, and also introduced Ludlow to leading members of the artistic community. After moving back to New York, Ludlow was in demand as a designer of country homes, but he turned his attention to designing apartment buildings, which were in demand as a result of the high cost of living in New York. In addition to designing apartments in New York's fashionable Upper East Side and elegant Chelsea, Ludlow also designed apartment buildings in Boston and Philadelphia. The most notable of Ludlow's large-scale apartment buildings is the Crosby apartment house in New York, built in 1904. Ludlow's apartment buildings are not distinguished by traditional New York City townhouse design or international style. Instead, Ludlow's buildings combined a number of different decorative features, often mixing neoclassical and Dutch revival styles and combining them to fashion what Ludlow called "a sort of eclectic compromise." The result of this eclectic style was an overall appearance of calmness and calm.
