I have recorded the signal output of the signal generator over a period of time, and then tried to write a program which calculates the output power over time. I have chosen linear regression as it should result in the lowest residual errors and hence, the best approximation. I have been confused about the assumption I make: Do I assume the power/amplitude of the signal output does not change with time, or is it allowed for me to make this assumption? Is there any reason why it is impossible to make this assumption in linear regression? I have used a script from this paper which comes with matlab and I am new to signal analysis so this should be understandable. A: To my knowledge, you can't assume the model to be linear. If you assume it linear, you have to provide the coefficients of the linear model. This is an example: If it is linear, then you can explain the output by the input. If you don't assume it is linear and just use the linear model, your result will be the relative change of the input (i.e. your coefficients) divided by the relative change of the output. If you assume it is linear, the output can only be explained by the input. If you don't assume it is linear, you will have the ratio of

Und in den meisten Teilen der Welt erhielten deutsche Firmen dabei ein erheblich besseres Ergebnis als ihre amerikanischen Konkurrenten. Hinter der Beispielfamilie "Hergestellte Industrien" (HII) steht das britische Waffen- und Rüstungsstart-Unternehmen BAE Systems, das das eigene Unternehmen seit seiner Gründung in 2001 mit großen Geldbußen zu tun hatte, vor allem die Entscheidung des kalifornischen Staatskonzerns General Motors zurückzuziehen. In den Vorjahren entstanden durch Investitionen von BAE in die amerikanische Waffenindustrie mehr als neun Milliarden Dollar an Schadenersatzklagen, überwiegt jedoch bei der kürzlich erschienenen Auswertung der Statistik des amerikanischen Statistikamts nicht nur die Behauptung, dass BAE etwas gutes Geld verdient ha
