The present invention relates to the field of memory systems, such as solid state disks, and more specifically to scrubbing memory systems. Modern electronic systems can include multiple components, each having a distinct hardware and software architecture. Components of an electronic system can work together to provide a desired function in the electronic system. To properly operate and/or be tested, some electronic system components may require data to be stored or retrieved from a memory location. One or more of these components may store this data at a memory location in a way that makes it difficult for the component to retrieve the data (e.g., a write-once memory system). Accordingly, the component may scrub data from the memory location (e.g., through a scrubbing operation) to relocate the data to be readily accessible (e.g., by another component). A scrubbing operation can be a time-consuming and/or power-consuming process that may be repeated on a periodic basis.

Additionally, a scrubbing operation may need to be performed on a memory location after its contents are to be changed, such as after the memory location is updated with new data (e.g., to replace original data with updated data).Matheus Martins Matheus Martins
