published for the Atari 2600, released in 1984. Gameplay The game consists of 40 levels, each with a different number of marbles. The player can choose to try to rescue all of the marbles in a level, or attempt to collect 500 points by destroying them all. In the former case, success requires a combination of good luck and careful precision. Each marble is worth as much as $50, and the game has an extremely high chance of failure. The marbles cannot be recolored, nor can they be moved or rotated by the player. The level editor, which can be accessed through the "Play Levels" option, allows the user to manipulate the game board. The marble colors may be recolored, and the level grid may be manually aligned, but the game must be saved at the very beginning of each of these edits. The game may also be saved, or the grid may be randomly generated. Several control settings may be accessed from the option screen. When the user has completed a level, the stage title is displayed above the game board. As the game draws out, the title scrolls across the screen. The cost for 100 points and 100 marbles are displayed on the upper left side of the screen. The player must pay the indicated cost before they can continue to the next level. If the cost cannot be paid, the game will lock. If the player is playing a rescue level, they are shown the sum of the cost of all lives and points that were saved. The game ends when the user reaches the last level or finishes on the 40th, and the user is paid the extra cost for the extra levels at that point. Levels One of the larger problems with playing this game is that it is incredibly difficult to play a reliable level. Depending on the speed and skill level of the player at any point in time, the game either runs as a high level simulation of a marble blast simulator, or a totally random model that never actually works. The game itself describes the first level as simply matching 3 marbles of one color and 2 of another. Ranking Although the full game (not just level 1) gave the player a set number of lives, one must manually re-do their life totals at certain times throughout the game. The only times the tally is updated automatically is by entering new lives. This method is problematic, because the player is almost always at high
