Because the first index seems easy, but the problem is that we need to

What's new in Rising Storm 2: Vietnam:

The members of The Dave-Man spent the last few weeks tricking us to the point where we had an idea of how it was going to be released. We constructed a malicious rootkit that was disguised as an AV. As we were anticipating our release, we were hoping to pass the test by pouring in some cash in advance, so that we could up the number of successful tests, and secure a premium launching position from the end-user point of view. The problem is that nobody is willing to spend 100k to have a 100% success rate of what they are buying. Many vendors just won't spend that much money for something that they know is fail proof. The average consumer can't/won't spend that kind of money, and eventually they just go out shopping for a cheap AV that's reliable. Many of the new Anti-Virus vendors don't understand that they can't afford to be average. They need to do something that no-one else can do. They need to do what actually works. You either spend the money or you don't I don't think this will come as a surprise to anyone, but yes. I'll disclose that in the release. I think The Dave-Man will be releasing a pretty rudimentary commercial security suite, but one that gives the impression of being something much more. On the surface it may look like a mass commercial offering, but beneath that surface the user is going to find something that is much more substantial. The location of a license key, the amount it will cost, and the method of how it is priced will all be disclosed, so no where will the user have to go to the side and make a purchase. What The Dave-Man is planning is to not take the traditional approach of mass marketing whatever the current offering is, and to not expose the product to lots of initial users and remove the noise. The problem arises in that it's going to be the first or second entry into the market for most consumers, and everyone is going to expect results as fast as possible. When faced with purchasing such a suite one is not going to be too keen to commit, as they have a pretty good idea of what's coming, and they're probably going to expect the same result (or better) from their competitors. As such, The Dave-Man doesn't have
