Full VersionQ: Store NSString with a trailing period in my UserDefaults My application allows the user to enter a number in a text field. This number will always be 100 or less. When the user submits this information the UserDefaults is updated with the values entered. My problem is that when I enter NSString *newNumber = @"100"; [self.userDefaults setObject:newNumber forKey:@"myNumber"]; the app successfully saves the data to my UserDefaults.
However it will always save it as "100". I need it to store it with a period (or as I'm originally inputting it) i.e. "100." How can I accomplish this? A: For some reason, you're setting "myNumber" to be the string "100", not the number 100, which is why your keys are getting represented by "100." Tomoya Sakurai,

CEO of Square Enix's international branch, is promising that the company's upcoming Chocobo Party smartphone RPG will be their biggest title to date. "There's no question that there are more big titles, but the upcoming major RPG 'Chocobo Party' won't be too far off, as we've already made some key partnerships with the industry," Sakurai stated to Famitsu. "The game will have around 50 playable characters and around 60 different endings. I'd like to convey a message for the media that we've done a lot in terms of development for the world debut." As you might remember, Sakurai was somewhat open about the fact that it was on Square Enix's list of titles for its smartphone and tablet plans. Chocobo Party was first showcased at Square Enix's Final Fantasy XV event last month. Thanks, Games Talk.
