While studies have been done on the role of social media in the radicalization of political violence since the turn of the millennium, they have often come to conclusions that are not entirely positive. A recent Washington Post article discusses the appeal of some on the far-right to social media's "narrative time and place" - a phenomenon whereby these internet-savvy, often young and non-college-educated white men who share radical, and sometimes racist, views, find in social media a place to express their ideas, a place where they feel accepted and, often, this perceived acceptance leads to "radicalization". With internet penetration constantly rising in the developing world and the internet having been co-opted by populist politics in many countries from Hungary to the Philippines, it is likely that the trend will continue and, therefore, it is important to understand the phenomena of online radicalization of young people and how societies are reacting to the rise of this new phenomenon. It should be noted that other than the Facebook equivalent of the alt-right, which utilises memes and the like, the social media seems to have little appeal for those in the grey zones of the far-right, who express their political views in different ways - in the UK, 6d1f23a050
