To assess whether pulse pressure variation (PPV) can be used as an indicator of fluid responsiveness in cirrhotic patients before and after liver transplantation. Prospective study. University Hospital. Eleven cirrhotic patients before and 20 days after liver transplantation. Fluid responsiveness was assessed by PPV, stroke volume variation (SVV), transpulmonary thermodilution. Before liver transplantation, patients were classified as responders or non-responders using increasing doses of epinephrine (0.05, 0.15, and 0.30 µg/kg/min). After liver transplantation, responders did not respond to fluid challenge (0.5 mL/kg) and were classified as non-responders. Before liver transplantation, the PPV and SVV were comparable between responders and non-responders. After liver transplantation, PPV and SVV were lower in non-responders than in responders, whereas the increase in cardiac output in responders was not correlated with changes in PPV. PPV is similar to SVV in predicting fluid responsiveness in cirrh 6d1f23a050
