World Health Organization, Drug Control in the Public.In the lead-up to the 2016 presidential election, large numbers of Americans predicted a Trump victory. The Harvard-Harris poll found that 61 percent of likely voters thought Clinton would win. Nearly the same number (58 percent) predicted a victory for Trump. A national Fox News poll found that 57 percent of Republicans believed Clinton would win, with 21 percent predicting Trump would win. Yet by the end of the campaign, Hillary Clinton went into the White House with fewer votes than Trump did. Of course, in the famous words of Yogi Berra, "Nobody goes there anymore. It's too crowded." Reality is always more crowded than politicians expect, and the world is more complex than they can imagine. In addition, elections are always at least partly unpredictable, even when voters know what the conventional wisdom is. So, before making predictions about the election, look at the past, analyze data, predict the effects of the things that you know about the world and then use your best judgment to decide what the likely outcomes of the election will be. As a political scientist, I have been analyzing the way voters think about politics for more than 30 years, including analysis of the election. An important part of my work is forecasting what people think about politics and politics as they go into election years. From the 1960s to the early 1980s, political science focus was on how people vote, and how they make decisions about who to vote for. During this period, most political scientists believed that voters were logical, rational decision-makers. There was a belief in "the wisdom of crowds," that people could see what is right and what is wrong without politicians, and that they would use the collective
