Wankuri Rar celulares troyano editar sagradas utilidad GABAergic neurons are proposed to be involved in several basic brain functions such as cognitive processes, sensory integration, and in the development and maintenance of the nervous system. Despite the importance of these functions, relatively little is known about the chemical properties and pharmacology of GABAergic neurons. Our long-term objective is to study the molecular mechanisms of gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA) transmission in neurons to better understand the function and regulation of this important neurotransmitter system. The central focus is on GABAA receptors, which form the main postsynaptic sites of GABA-mediated currents. This application is focused on an important subclass of GABAA receptors that are composed of multiple receptor subunits, especially the alpha1, alpha2, beta2, and gamma2 subunits, and the corresponding GABAA receptor subtypes, alpha1beta2 and alpha2beta2. These receptors are often clustered at the postsynaptic sites, where they may interact with other neurotransmitter receptors to form heterooligomeric complexes involved in important and often non-homologous signaling pathways. We plan to study the roles of the alpha1 and alpha2 subunits by examining the pharmacological, developmental, and electrophysiological properties of recombinant alpha1beta2 and alpha2beta2 receptors. We plan to use two different strategies. First, cDNA constructs encoding for alpha1beta2 and alpha2beta2 receptors will be introduced into tsA201 cells. Second, we plan to subclone the genes for alpha1, alpha2, beta2 and gamma2 subunits from a rat cDNA library into the expression vectors YACT-4 and pEF1/V5-His. These vectors will be used to generate a panel of cell lines stably or transiently expressing recombinant GABAA receptors composed of different subunit combinations. The electrophysiological properties of the
