The tool was approved by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) in 1938, but the number of ECT procedures has drastically dropped since that time. In fact, fewer than ten ECT treatments were administered per million patients per year in 2007. This dramatic decrease in the number of treatments may be due to the increase in the numbers of trained ECT physicians. However, a new analysis published in the March issue of the Journal of the American Academy of Psychiatry and the Law concluded that being trained to administer ECT is unlikely to significantly increase the number of ECT procedures performed in the U.S. ECT is a common treatment for depression and other mental disorders. It involves a brief electrical current being administered to the brain, which then causes a temporary side effect called a generalized seizure. Individuals often receive up to five treatments of ECT. The treatment temporarily relieves the symptoms of depression and is thought to work because it stimulates the brain's production of serotonin. However, the effectiveness of the treatment can vary from patient to patient. ECT is administered by specially trained doctors, who are generally anesthesiologists. The analysis examined the amounts of ECT that physicians reported administering by year since the introduction of the procedure. Researchers then estimated the number of ECT treatments performed by analyzing U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) data on ECT procedures, physician earnings, and physician ECT training programs. The researchers found that over the past 80 years, physicians have been trained to administer ECT at a steady rate. After adjusting for inflation, the number of U.S. physicians trained to administer ECT has increased from 0.3 physicians per million patients in 1950 to 2.7 in 2001. Over the same time period, the number of ECT treatments has decreased from 566,410 in 1950 to 46,708 in 2001, according to the analysis. While there are thousands of ECT programs in the U.S., not all physicians work in these programs and not all physicians are trained to perform ECT. A 2007 study estimated that approximately 15 percent of U.S. physicians are trained to administer the treatment. The 6d1f23a050
