Google confirmed on Wednesday that it had "new information" about the Google+ user data scandal and will release the information "as soon as possible," according to a statement. "We recently became aware of new information about Google+ user data that we believe needs to be investigated further," a Google spokesperson told NBC News in an emailed statement. "We've been working with the outside counsel for the data team at Google to carefully consider and evaluate the information. We're committed to fully answering these important questions, and will let you know as soon as possible when we have something to share." Google+ is the social network that the search giant killed last year. Google announced the move in January, writing, "We made the difficult decision to sunset Google+ last year after assessing our approach to growing and operating the product." Google+ had more than 300 million users at the time.
