Their focus is on three problem areas: (a) the lack of research on the effectiveness of various drug treatment programs for crack users; (b) drug treatment programs that are available to crack users but are not accessible to a substantial proportion of them; and (c) the adequacy of drug treatment resources for people who do get help from the drug treatment program. Their report makes a number of major claims: (a) that the effectiveness of drug treatment programs for crack users is questionable; (b) that there is room for improvement of existing drug treatment programs; and (c) that the total amount of funding directed towards drug treatment programs is inadequate. Why are drug treatment programs for crack users questioned? The first major claim they make in this report is that drug treatment programs for crack users are ineffective because the results of such programs are often disappointing. Many of these programs were established around the time of the introduction of the drug treatment regime and major changes in drug policy in 1984. Although these programs are supported by the Ontario government, they operate within the context of extensive punitive treatment regimes, which became the norm for non-violent drug users in the mid-1980s. The authors of this report point out that much of the research evidence on drug treatment programs is based on so-called 'experimental' research, in which users are deliberately selected for entry into treatment. The second major claim is that the effectiveness of drug treatment programs for crack users is questionable. In their view, the answer to this question should be 'yes', but problems arise from the definition of 'effectiveness'. In the authors' view, the effectiveness of drug treatment programs is to be judged against the interests of drug users and other society members. Only when these interests are taken into account can we adequately assess how effective the drug treatment program is, whether or not it is effective, and what would be the consequences if it was c6a93da74d
